Little Rock honors freedom of speech, press with Law Day

By Staff Sgt. Dana J. Cable

19th Airlift Wing Public Affairs

The Little Rock Air Force Base legal office and Law Day committee hosted a Law Day presentation May 1 at LRAFB.

Held annually on May 1, Law Day is a national day set aside to celebrate the rule of law and provides an opportunity to understand how law and the legal process protect our civil liberties and contribute to the freedoms that all Americans share.

U.S. Air Force Col. Gerald Donohue, 19th Airlift Wing commander and Lt. Col. Jacqueline Stingl, 19th AW staff judge advocate, were joined by the mayor Bob Johnson, of Jacksonville, and Stephanie Friedman, Jacksonville city attorney, to sign the Law Day Proclamation.

Every year the American Bar Association selects an annual theme for Law Day.

This year's theme—Free Speech, Free Press, Free Society—focuses on the pillars of representative government and calls on people to understand and protect these rights to ensure, as the U.S. Constitution proposes, “the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity.”

In the late 1950s, the American Bar Association and President Dwight D. Eisenhower initiated Law Day with the idea of encouraging attorneys and paralegals nationwide to venture out into the community, particularly to local schools, to teach people about the law with the aim of inspiring those and helping them to appreciate the importance of the law in our society.

“Here at the legal office, our Law Day planning committee decided to host a writing competition in which students from elementary school, middle school, and high school could write an essay on freedom of speech and freedom of press and how it affects them,” said Capt. Tzivia Freeman-Dasent, 19th Airlift Wing chief of legal assistance and preventative law.

The writing competition winners, Kaitlyn Brooks and Peyton Reed, were on hand to read their essays during the Law Day presentation.

“Having our future leaders from middle school and high school reading their essays that they wrote made the day even more special,” Freeman-Dasent said.

night May 3 with questions related to free speech and free press as well as other events involving local students.

“We also hosted a painting event at the youth center,” Freeman-Dasent said. “We gave the children aged from 8-14 a lesson on freedom of speech and free press and

Little Rock Airmen test next generation gas mask

By Senior Airman Rhett Isbell

19th Airlift Wing Public Affairs

Airmen from Little Rock Air Force Base, Arkansas, tested the capabilities of the M69 Joint Service Aircrew Mask Strategic Aircraft for implementation and field use for individual respiratory, ocular and percutaneous protection against chemical biological agents on the C-130J airframe April 25-30. The M69 is intended to replace the Aircrew Eye and Respiratory Protection system.

A joint team led by Air Combat Command's 52nd Wing and 28th Test and Evaluation Squadron located at Eglin Air Force Base, Florida, provided guidance and supervision to Airmen as they tested the new Aircrew Chemical Biological Radiological Nuclear system on C-130J aircraft. A total of 13 Airmen participated in the operational testing evaluation, consisting of nine aircrew and four aircrew flight equipment technicians.

"Operational tests are one of the last phases of the acquisition and a necessary part of the path towards receiving a full-rate production decision," said U.S. Air Force Kevin O'Neal, ACC ACBRN AFE combat developer. "The testing involves a realistic look at how the system would be used operationally. We're challenging the AFE technicians to be trained and then apply the maintenance, sizing, and fitting concepts they learned. Additionally, aircrew were asked to review various mission profiles in a static aircraft, with the final evaluation in the C-130J simulator conducting both day and night missions complete with night vision devices."

The tests are part of a joint acquisition program and were designed to show how the M69 is the next generation in aircrew CBRN safety after years of rigorous testing and studies.

"The Home of Combat Airlift is the perfect venue for testing the next-generation aircrew CBRN system," said U.S. Air Force Col. Shane Haughian, 19th Operations Group commander. "Our Airmen have gotten after readiness training aggressively from the wing level on down, and we are excited to be a part of this process as it will directly impact how we fight. This equipment will ultimately make it logistically easier for our aircrews to perform their mission in austere conditions.”

The M69's introduction to the military has a number of positive effects compared to the USAF's legacy AERP, including: reduced thermal burden, decreased bulk, increased field of view, increased field of regard, ease of use, and ease of maintenance.

“It allows for a safer, longer-lasting operating environment,” said U.S. Air Force Tech. Sgt. Benjamin Leis, 19th Operations Support Squadron noncommissioned officer in charge of AFE quality assurance. “As far as aviation in any type of contamination, I think we're in a far better situation for aircrew protection and the ability to maintain operations in contested environments with this piece of equipment. It's also a lot easier to train young Airmen on this piece of equipment as well.”

After testing the compatibility and effectiveness of the M69, as well as identifying any hurdles the development team may need to be aware of for the C-130J airframe, Little Rock team members removed their gear and returned to their normal duties while awaiting the release of the new equipment for the U.S. Air Force and the other services.

“I would feel better being able to use the M69 because we're going after a better technology,” O'Neal said. “The U.S. Air Force is targeting full capability in fiscal year 2023, and looking at starting our first fielding location around October 2019. There's been a lot of hard work leading up to this, and I think it will be a much better solution for our aircrew if required to operate in a CBRN environment.”

Students from nine high schools across Arkansas, Mississippi and Tennessee were invited to attend a Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps Expo at Little Rock Air Force Base on May 3.

More than 300 cadets from multiple U.S. Army, U.S. Navy, and US. Air Force JROTC programs attended the event to experience the active-duty lifestyle as a service member for a day.

“We were very excited to attend this event,” said Lt. Commander Michael Raymer, Navy Junior ROTC senior naval science instructor. “Our program’s goal is to help set and achieve goals of our students, and events like this help pique their interest in the opportunities that are available to them.”

Students, teachers and chaperones toured base amenities such as the base gym and the Airman dormitories. Exhibitions at the Expo included a military working dog and a base honor guard demonstration.

"I'm having a lot of fun," said Ashton Outlaw, a Navy Junior ROTC cadet petty officer first class. "This is a very thrilling experience."

Even though the Junior ROTC Expo focused on military careers, the true intent was to inform students of the avenues available for them to accomplish their goals and inspire them to be leaders in society.

"It's so important to engage with our community at a human level," said U.S. Air Force Capt. Bree Lanz, Junior ROTC Expo planning committee member. "Events like this give us the chance to get the word out about the opportunities the military could provide for them and give them an inside look at the things they could do. Ultimately, we're talking to the future leaders in our community, and potentially building a better total work force."
